Unlike most Turks or Iranians, the Tibetans did not so much use their rugs as a floor or wall coverings, but used them as bench cover or meditation mat. The Tibetan wool is very appropriate for rugs: strong, flexible and shiny. Men or women spin the wool either on their thigh or on a spinning top.

The pile is knotted with a technique of loops winded around a rod.

Rugs for homely use were made on narrow looms without a wooden structure. Warps threads were fastened behind the weaver . Narrow stripes were produced and sewn together.
